Aoyama Funeral Hall was established in 1901 by Hikita and was transferred to Tokyo city in 1925 and became the only public funeral hall.

It burned down in May 1945 due to the war, but it was restored in December 1953 by the requests of many.

The building was demolished in 1974 because of deterioration, and redesigned in a Western style. It was repaired in 1985 and 1986.

There are 300 seats in the ceremonial hall, and the new waiting room constructed in 2011 can accommodate up to 450 people. A mortuary (two private rooms) was built in 2017. There are other facilities including the gathering room, the bereaved room, and a courtyard.

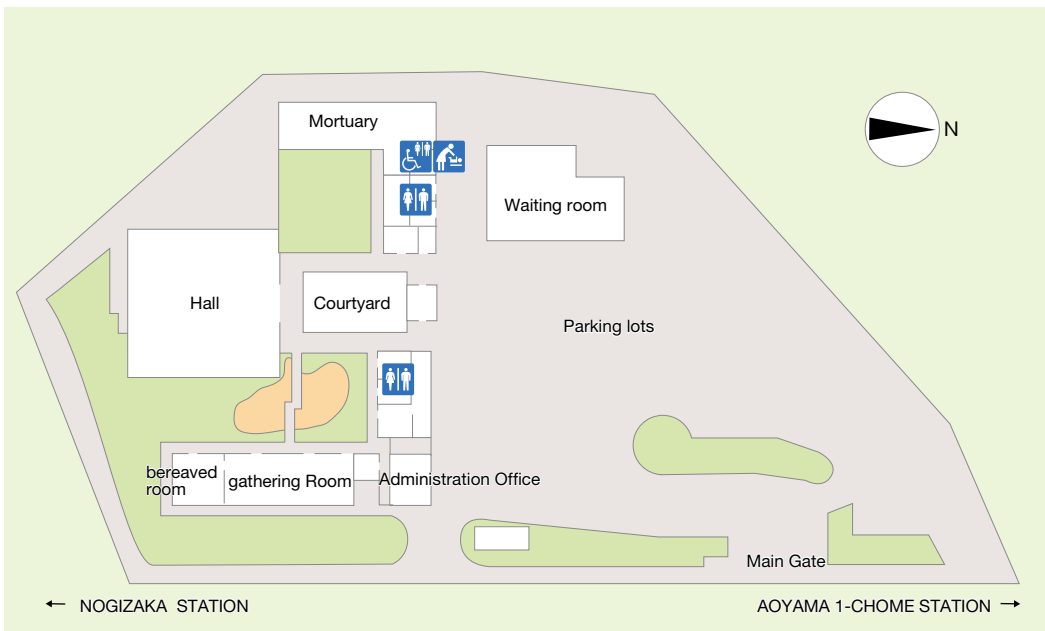

The funeral hall can seat a large number of people for celebrities, living national treasures and international managers, but it also performs funerals for families and small groups.

Recently, people such as elementary school teachers and people who contributed locally are having funeral services here.
